Ali, a 28-year-old from Karachi, arrived in Berlin for his Master's degree, brimming with excitement. However, reality quickly hit him as he struggled to adjust in daily life. The bustling streets of Berlin felt distant compared to the warmth of Karachi's communal life. Locals seemed distant, their preference for personal space contrasting sharply with the lively, social gatherings back home. Simple tasks, like finding the right food or explaining his prayer routine, became daily challenges. His limited German skills caused frequent miscommunications, leaving him feeling isolated and disconnected. Questions from peers about his background often felt judgmental, making him defensive about where he came from. At the same time, Ali found himself making assumptions about others, viewing the locals as cold and too formal.

Determined to adjust, Ali joined a language course and attended events to learn about local customs. Gradually, he began sharing stories about life in Pakistan, from its delicious foods to its colorful festivals, breaking misconceptions. In return, he gained a deeper appreciation for local traditions, such as holiday celebrations and their emphasis on punctuality. Over time, however, he realized they valued kindness and close family ties, though expressed differently than he was used to. By understanding and accepting these differences, Ali began to settle, turning his experience into a lesson in respect, and cultural understanding.
