Q1: Case Study: Zing Drinks

(14 Marks)

Anya Sharma, a recent business graduate, saw a problem in the bustling, health-conscious city of Aethelburg. Everyone around her—students, young professionals, fitness enthusiasts—was either drowning in sugary energy drinks or bored with plain water. They craved something more: a natural boost, a unique taste, and a brand that felt like it understood them. This spark of an idea became Zing Drinks. She poured her passion into creating a line of sparkling botanical beverages, infused with natural nootropics like lion's mane mushroom and ashwagandha. The promise was "Sustained Focus, Without the Crash." The flavours were anything but ordinary: Blueberry Basil Clarity, Ginger Turmeric Glow, and Peach Rosemary Renewal. The elegant, minimalist cans were an instant hit at local pop-up stalls in yoga studios and tech hubs. People were captivated by the unique taste and the compelling story behind the brand. Buoyed by this early success, Anya invested her savings and a small loan to scale up, leasing a commercial kitchen and hiring a small team.

But six months after this exciting launch, the initial fizz has settled, and reality has set in. Growth has stalled. Sales are inconsistent, and despite her passionate niche following, Zing Drinks hasn't managed to break into the mainstream. Anya now faces the complex challenges of a real business. Her core fans love the unusual flavours, but feedback from larger stores suggests they are "too weird" for the average shopper who isn't sure what to expect. The very premium ingredients that define the brand make it expensive to produce.

She priced each can at $3.50, a premium point she felt justified by the quality, but this puts her in direct competition with giant, established brands that have massive marketing power. Retailers are now pressuring her to lower the price to move inventory faster, squeezing her already slim margins. Zing is stuck in a few high-end gyms and local organic grocery chains, and her attempts to get into national retail chains have hit walls, with buyers dismissing Zing as an unproven risk. Her online sales are minimal, crippled by the high cost of shipping heavy liquids. Her promotional efforts, once solely reliant on organic social media and grassroots sampling, are no longer enough to fuel growth. A recent Instagram ad campaign got clicks but not enough conversions, further straining her budget. Anya is at a crossroads, sitting at her desk and staring at the spreadsheets. She believes in her product with all her heart but knows her current path is unsustainable. She needs a new, cohesive strategy—one that can refine her offering, communicate her value, and get Zing Drinks into the hands of the masses without losing the soul of the brand she worked so hard to build.
